*The £100,000 campaign - ordered by Westminster council - mirrors policies recently highlighted by John Major, who said simple, low-cost measures could have a significant effect in fighting crime.

A key part of the Westminster initiative involves moves to 'design out' crime - installing better lighting and close-circuit cameras in high-risk zones like car parks and estates and protecting homes against opportunist thieves.

The Guardian (London) November

The success of initiatives to make our cities safer

There is now a consensus between the major political parties of the importance of building such "partnership approaches" to crime prevention, and many local authorities now regard such work as a high priority, often under the banner of "community safety".

Other changes are being contemplated within Whitehall, including the possibility of making it a requirement of planning law that developers "design out" crime in any new buildings.
